And vaguely watch the curtain broad and gray Lifting anew from the bright scene of day. x. When creeping sultry hours from noontide go, He rounds the hawthorn hedges well-known turn, Melting in Midsummer its bloomy snow, And through the chapel gate. His heart forlorn Draws strength and comfort from the pitying shrine Whereat he bows with reverential sign. XI. Behind the chapel, down a sloping hill, Circling the ancient abbeys ivied walls The graveyard sleeps. A little gurgling rill Poured through a corner of the ruin, falls Into a dusky-waterd pond, and lags With lazy eddies mid its yellow flags. XII. Across this pool, the hollow banks enfold An orchard, overrun with rankest grass, Of gnarld and mossy apple-trees as old As th oldest graves almost; and thither pass The smooth-worn stepping-stones that give their aid To many a labourer and milking-maid, XIII. And not...
