One good resulted from this failure of his piece; the king, touched by his necessities, sent him one hundred pounds. Charles did more: he raised the pension from one hundred marks to one hundred pounds, and added a tierce of canary. This was princely, but it did not release Jonson from his difficulties. He no longer received the handsome gratuities from the court, or from the nobles, or from the city companies. As his fame was declining; Inigo Jones, formerly his friend, now his enemy, was thought to have greater talent for pageants; he fell, neglected, into comparative oblivion. We hear of him only from his applications to the great for pecuniary relief. The pension, with the wine, was surely enough to support him; but he was always a stranger to worldly prudence: what was liberally given, says Gifford, he lavishly spent, and he was seldom free from want. Even now, that he was excluded from so many sources of profit--that he was not wanted to compose masques and pageants for court, nobility, or city companies--he lived as expensively as in his most prosperous days. Melancholy as was now the situation of Jonson, --one of sickness and poverty, --it was the more incumbent to exercise his talents, impaired as they were. Though he had no longer any hope from the stage, he did not wholly forsake it. In 1()32 he produced...
